The operator would normally do this in three steps: 1. Identify safety-critical vehicle functions. 2. Identify safety-critical computer system functions. 3. Describe safety-critical computer system functions. When software is integrated as part of a system to command, control, or monitor safety-critical functions, special measures are required to understand and mitigate safety risks. Identifying those functions that are essential to safe performance or operation is the first imperative. Isolating these safety-critical vehicle functions helps the operator determine priorities within the safety effort, focus use of resources, and tailor activities based on the most important safety concerns. Examples of safety-critical vehicle functions include, but are not limited to, the following: Dynamic and static air data processing. Attitude, altitude, and heading sensing and display. Instantaneous Impact Point (IIP) tracking and display. Propulsion system control, including rocket engine start or shutdown operations. Propulsion system health monitoring and display, such as engine pressures and temperatures. Propellant dumping. Propellant tank and fuel management system maintenance and sensing. Flight control actuation hea. . . This item ships from La Vergne,TN. Paperback.
