As the temperature falls particles of paraffin rise to the surface. These collect as a scum in front of the roll and are easily removed. If the washer becomes coated the wax may be forced through it by means of steam. In general, the pulp is clean about three hours after it has been placed in the beater. If the pulp has been well washed in the previous operation, the time required is lessened. Any paraffin remaining in the pulp after the treatment in the beater is caught by the screen boxes of the paper machine. In the experiments conducted it proved to be a very small quantity. If the stock contains much ink it must be treated with caustic soda and bleached in the usual way. If ink is absent this operation is unnecessary. It is well to use the beater employed for the...
