Not illustrated. 1809 Excerpt: . . . to Shakespeare imputes to the two antagonists of Warburton. In a moment of petulance, he would sting like a fly, suck a little blood, take a gay flutter, and return, no more. But in seasons of rage he would bite like a viper, and would have been glad to leave inflammation and gangrene behind him. Never can the well-wishers of Mr. Fox forget the treatment which he experienced from the opponent to whom I advert, when enfeebled by disease and harrassed by care he attended the business of the house of Commons in the Session before his death. The strength, of that opponent bore, indeed, little proportion to his malignity. But his noisy, restless, querulous, insolent freaks of hostility must often have brought to your mind the odious office which a poet of antiquity has assigned to one of the Dine; and often has he provoked me, with a slight alteration, of Virgil's language, to exclaim, Alitis harum una in parvae conlecta figuram, Qua deserta fori circum subsellia quondam, . Importuna canit, Turni se pestis ob ora Fertque refertque sonans, clypeumque Cverberat alis HAVING stated my expectation that Mr. Fox's projected History would not be unworthy of his general fame, and that the correctness of the style would be proportionate to the importance of the matter. I intended to communicate to you such remarks as might occur to my mind upon the perusal of a work which had not appeared when I began to address you....
