W, Inge, of Alabama, on the Relation of Parties to the Mexican War The policy and objects of the antagonistic party I shall endeavor to unfold in the course of my remarks. The history of parties, in connection with the Mexican war, in its origin, progress, and termination, forms a curious chapter in American politics. I shall examine the relation of parties to this great question, with a view of presenting the conduct of each to the impartial judgment of the people; and in my comments upon the course of that party opposed to the present Administration, I desire to be understood as limiting their application to politicians by trade. The great body of the American people, however known by party appellations, and divided by differences of opinion, are moved by the same impulses of patriotism when the national honor is involved. The history of Texas, its revolution, and subsequent annexation to the American confederacy, is so familiarly known to the world, as to relieve me from minute detail. I...
