Not illustrated. 1882 Excerpt: .So-and-so seems to have taken a fresh partner, he went on, gradually becoming more and more interested with what he saw. Shall I go boldly to John Harbuckle, and tell him everything? he asked himself presently. He knows where my Jessie is. I suppose it will come to that some time or another. Why not at once? No, I can't; I cannot. Am I radically a coward?--There are men I can't face. He's one of them. The dining-room of the Tavistock is not very unlike the coffee-room. It is the fashion in that old established house to have the joints on wheeled tables for the better pleasing of those who are fastidious as to their cut of beef or mutton. The waiter found Mr. Birkett difficult to please on the evening of this particular day; and no sooner had that most obliging functionary started to attend to some else, than Mr. Birkett called him back. Here, take that away, he said, shivering. Let me have a large pot of strong tea and some toast, at once. You appear to feel this weather keenly, remarked the man who occupied the seat facing Arnold Birkett. It was the first sentence that had been spoken to him since he had landed, except by the hotel people. Why, yes, he returned. It's the very opposite to the climate I've been accustomed to for many years past. Sho-o-o! with a another shiver. These east winds are...
