That rolling orb which wakes the smiling morn Had just on highest summits cast a dawn, And sent a streak of heaven-glancing light Among the fading shadows of the night; To open up, within a tropic clime, A day of dryness, laziness and crime. Within a land where Aztecs once have been, And warring Toltecs, passing o er the scene. Have stamp d their image, rear d some walls on high, Which now in flat-abandon d ruin lie; Like all the palaces that man will rear, To stand their useful day and disappear. Now down the vale the morn begins to break, And bids the creatures of the plains awake. This is the valley of the Gila plain, Where vegetation languishes for rain; And all the cactus, ferns and straggling flowers Do droop their heads beneath their leafy bowers, And pray the sun this precious boon to grant; To give them rain for which their fiber pant, Or they will hang their weary...
